Public trust is the bedrock of scholarly research and integrity its cornerstone. Today more than ever we hear “trust and follow the science.” This trust is built on the unwavering integrity of research practitioners, the steadfast scientific process and the unbiased product (finding). When the foundation is broken intentionally or unintentionally the consequences are felt across society, space and time.

Join us as Dr. Alesi leads a discussion on the three cardinal sins of research conduct: falsification, fabrication and plagiarism that can chip away public trust and research integrity.
